This was considered to be a somewhat hysterical response by some employment advisors.

Focus

The idea is to focus on developing M&I and Pratliperl if the substantial R&D required for the latter justifies it.

Pratliperl

To succeed in this substantive R&D needs to be conducted to determine cost / benefit ratio`s following enhanced regulatory provisions to manage recent concerns about bushfires and lithium battery fires.

IRFF long term

25. A disturbing encounter with Job seeker employee who not only appeared to be completely ignorant of my past and present circumstances but was dismissive and demeaning of any reference to my efforts to date, displayed conceited, haughty, aloof and narcissistic traits. This was followed by some unexpected and previously not discussed changes to my obligations. Non recognition of surplus points earned during the previous period and the removal of credits for the approved studies that I am currently busy with. The ignoring of my correspondence by someone I had spent considerable time to keep fully briefed and built up what I thought was a very good business relationship with, also has not helped. – Pivot – (1) This submission and the R&D on (2) possible litigation as this kind of abuse has been polled amongst many of my friends and acquaintances, (some in very senior positions in the legal profession), and all agree that it has gone on for far too long and needs to be adjusted or reigned in with an appropriate order of court that will provide legal machinery for the truncation of the current abuse etc. (3) Assist the COACT management on developing remedial training to prevent a recurrence of the abuse implicit herein. (4) Ignore, object and curtail when it next occurs and spend energies on positive development.

Current state of mind

Frustrated, disappointed, sometimes depressed but upbeat and confident that one of the initiatives will start producing good income or that I can be placed in a lucrative consultation position with flexible hours.

That is if I am given the chance to undergo the treatment to restore my health to the point where I can do a full day`s work and provided I am not needlessly distracted by having to generate interim income to cover my existing small budget.

Should the abuse inherent in the state`s recalcitrance in recognising my past achievements and qualifications and thereby sabotaging my chances of regaining my financial independence from the state itself[38], then the prospect of litigating for damages certainly provides hope of some sort of redress of wrongs, vindication and financial compensation.

[38] This could arguably be interpreted as collusive in law

Most likely just to ignore the abuse (whilst developing ways to curtail it as it occurs through objection, cross examination and compassionate instruction) and rather spend my energies on positive development and recovery

OCRD and legal recourse - preliminary R&D

Question 1

Given that when a state has such an obsession with its own regulations that it does not recognise the achievements and certifications held by persons from other (outside) states, and that such behaviour might most likely cause resentment in such affected individuals. (1) How would you, as one of those affected individuals, describe the subsequent state`s abuse in social, legal and political terms? (2) What medical and psychotic condition such as for example Obsessive Compulsive Regulation Disorder (OCRD) would you ascribe to the state. Moreover, (3) what medical and psychological condition would you scribed to the affected individual in not wanting to interact with individuals and corporations that manifest OCRD?

Perplexity AI response to question on state`s OCRD

The situation described suggests a complex interplay between social, legal, and medical factors. As an affected individual, you might perceive the state's behaviour as a form of regulatory protectionism, leading to social and legal exclusion. In medical terms, while there is no formal diagnosis of "Obsessive Compulsive Regulation Disorder (OCRD)" in the psychological or psychiatric literature, the state's behaviour could be metaphorically likened to obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD) in its inflexible adherence to regulations and reluctance to recognize external certifications [1][3][4]. This metaphorical comparison is not a formal diagnosis but rather an illustrative analogy.

As for the affected individual's response, their reluctance to engage with entities manifesting OCRD-like behaviour could be seen as a natural reaction to protect their well-being and mental health. This response might be associated with increased stress, anxiety, and potential avoidance behaviours, which could be indicative of the impact of the state's behaviour on the affected individual's mental health.

However, it's important to note that assigning a specific medical or psychological condition to the affected individual would require a comprehensive assessment by a qualified (an appropriate[39]) (added) mental health professional.

The individual's response could potentially be linked to stress-related disorders, anxiety, or trauma-related conditions, especially if they have experienced significant distress due to the state's behaviour [2][5].

In summary, while the state's behaviour may be metaphorically compared to OCD in its inflexible regulatory approach, it's essential to approach the medical and [39] Where the individual is an avid adherent to the Judaeo Christian bases of our modern civilization and someone who has covenanted with the redemption sacrifice by the benefactor of today`s date, viz. Jesus Christ, then that assessment would necessarily have to be conducted by someone of similar beliefs and convictions in order to eliminate any bias or discreditation of the result of the inquiry.

psychological impact on the affected individual with caution, as specific diagnoses should only be made by qualified professionals following a thorough evaluation.

Question 2

What grounds in Australian law (especially in terms of the Human Rights Act 2019 of Queensland) could such an affected individual have against the state? Not only for human rights violations, but also in respect of defamation, libel, calumniation and monetary compensation for trauma and financial loss etc.?

Answer

In Australian law, especially under the Human Rights Act 2019 of Queensland, an affected individual could seek recourse against the state for potential human rights violations and other legal claims. The Human Rights Act 2019 of Queensland protects 23 fundamental human rights and requires each arm of the government to act compatibly with these rights [1][3]. If an individual believes that their human rights have been infringed, they can make a complaint to the Queensland Human Rights Commission (QHRC) after lodging a complaint with the relevant public entity [1]. The Act provides a framework for addressing human rights issues and seeking redress for violations.

In addition to human rights claims, the affected individual could potentially pursue legal action against the state for defamation, libel, or calumniation if they have been subject to false and damaging statements. As for seeking monetary compensation for trauma and financial loss, this would typically fall under the purview of civil litigation, where the affected individual could file a lawsuit against the state to seek damages for the harm suffered.

It's important to note that pursuing these legal avenues would require the guidance of legal professionals with expertise in human rights law, defamation, and civil litigation. Each case is unique, and the specific grounds for legal action would depend on the individual circumstances and the nature of the alleged harm.

In summary, under the Human Rights Act 2019 of Queensland, an affected individual has avenues to address potential human rights violations and other legal claims against the state. Seeking redress for such grievances would involve following the procedures outlined in the Act and potentially engaging legal counsel to pursue defamation, libel, calumniation, and compensation claims.

Question 3

What agencies (state, international, NGO`s and private) can an affected person approach for legal assistance in a case against the state on such grounds? (Especially, should the abuse inherent in the state`s recalcitrance in recognising such an effected person`s past achievements and qualifications and thereby sabotaging his or her chances of regaining my financial independence from the state itself (arguably manipulative and collusive), then the prospect of litigating for damages should certainly provide hope of some sort of redress of wrongs, vindication and financial compensation).

Answer

In Queensland, an affected individual seeking legal assistance in a case against the state on grounds of defamation, human rights violations, and financial compensation may approach various agencies, including state, international, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and private entities.

1. State Agencies:

- Queensland Human Rights Commission (QHRC):

The QHRC handles complaints related to human rights violations under the Human Rights Act 2019 of Queensland. They provide a mechanism for addressing human rights issues and seeking redress for violations [4].

- Legal Aid Queensland:

This agency provides legal assistance and support for individuals who may not be able to afford a lawyer. They offer services in various legal matters, including human rights and defamation [4].

2. International and NGO Agencies:

- Australian Human Rights Commission:

While not specific to Queensland, the Australian Human Rights Commission handles complaints related to human rights violations at the federal level. They provide guidance and support on human rights issues [5].

- Amnesty International Australia:
This NGO focuses on human rights advocacy and may provide support or guidance on cases involving human rights violations [2].

3. Private Legal Firms:
- Engaging a private legal firm with expertise in defamation, human rights law, and civil litigation can also be instrumental in pursuing legal action against the state for damages and vindication.

It's important for the affected individual to seek legal advice from professionals with expertise in the relevant areas of law to understand the options available and to pursue the appropriate course of action. Each case is unique, and the specific agencies or entities approached for assistance would depend on the nature of the claims and the expertise required.

Question 4

What are the legal remedies for defamation, libel, and calumniation in Australia

Answer
In Australia, the legal remedies for defamation, libel, and calumniation are primarily governed by the Defamation Act 2005. The Act provides the following remedies in an action for defamation:

1. Compensatory Damages:
This includes compensation for the harm suffered as a result of the defamation, such as damage to reputation, hurt feelings, and economic loss.

2. Injunction:
The court may grant an injunction to stop further publication of the defamatory statements.

3. Correction or Retraction:
The court may order the defendant to publish a correction or retraction of the defamatory statements.

4. Punitive Damages:
In certain cases, involving flagrant disregard, the court may award punitive damages [1].

Additionally, individuals in Australia can seek legal assistance from various sources, including state, international, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and private entities. Some of these sources include:

1. State Agencies:
   - Legal Aid Commissions: Each state in Australia has its own Legal Aid Commission, which provides legal assistance and support for individuals who may not be able to afford a lawyer. They offer services in various legal matters, including defamation.

2. Private Legal Firms:
   - Engaging a private legal firm with expertise in defamation law can also be instrumental in pursuing legal action against defamation, libel, and calumniation.

It's important for individuals to seek legal advice from professionals with expertise in defamation law to understand the specific remedies available in their situation and to pursue the appropriate course of action. Each case is unique, and the specific agencies or entities approached for assistance would depend on the nature of the claims and the expertise required.
